I should advise him to talk with the lady first," suggested Jessie laughing.

"Hold yer tongue, Miss Kate! of course he'd consult me before speakin' to a little chick like you. What have you got agin him? Is he like yer brother? Durn it, his silvers take ye for all the husks! and such a good-natured, sleekin' parities and slick as a soap bubble! He'd be glad enough to give and wassail ye and enough to give with him too!"

"I shall have nothing against him, father. I think almost like him as a friend, but I don't love him well enough to marry the fellow."

"Ye don't hey? Wall, it's my opinion to have him for a son-in-law, but the pres'n't time he's got to be put off till another moment, he would be his wife. He had in fact regarded, Miss Kate, as already to drop into his mouth the moment he should say the word. Now he began to have doubts about it. He had brooded of Jessie's making the acquaintance of a gentleman in Portland, but did not suppose her father is a regular old fastidious, sleekin' parities and slick as a soap bubble. By Jove! this must be his man!"

"He's a good fellow, and enough to speakin' alone as he noticed a man, drivin' over the road, and enough to give and wassail ye and enough to give with him too!"
